SONGLINES - Barbican Concourse Gallery - until Sept 4.

This show represents the summit of the inspirational Aboriginal Arts season from Charlotte Street's Rebecca Hossack Gallery. Since Easter, Hossack has mounted a series of six distinct yet interrelated displays, ranging from burial poles to boomerangs.

Hossack was born and brought up in Australia, but it wasn't until she came to Britain to study law that she learnt about the plight of the Aboriginal people, and their distinctive art.

Since then, she has made numerous journeys into the Australian outback, travelling overland by jeep to reach the remotest Aboriginal outposts, in search of an artistic tradition that stretches back a full 40,000 years.

The result is 'Songlines' - a cross section of dot paintings from Balgo Hills, which are among the most isolated regions known to man. Some relate to ancient myths and legends, others employ ancient techniques to depict the white man's farms and ranches.

The vivid colours are transfixing, the repeated patterns hypnotic. The marriage of an age old aesthetic and modern subject is a bizarre spectacle to behold. This is truly art from the other end of the world. England might as well be on another planet.

For the purposes of this transfer, Hossack has added various embellishments to that core: silk screens, rugs, monochromatic prints. The painfully intense black and white portrait photos pay silent tribute to the suffering of a proud and tragic people.

One wonders whether Hossack is, albeit with the best possible intentions, contributing to an exposure which, non-existent up until now, has played a fundamental part in the retention of such an untampered aspect of the Aboriginal culture. After all, for a nomadic race, what is urbanisation but a sophisticated form of genocide.
